Visual Annotation #1: South Metope 31 < Parthenon

-Using Cartesian $\mathbb{R}^3$ in (x,y,z) coordinates as a rough guide, I can tell this is an example of bas relief on marble

KNB: Since 75% of z-depth of both the Centaur and Man are carved out of the single piece of marble

-I estimate about 55%-66% of both subjects depicted "z-depth" were carved out of the marble by the sculptor's original intent/design man trying to punch back at the attack Centaur. Does not look very convincing as a realistic counter-punch. At least the Man is trying not to fluff

Circular area Centaur dropping out the helpless man presumably to attack the victim with his [missing/broken away] dominant right hand from the original work

I believe this is an example of high relief (Caly, alto-relievo in Italian)

-These bas relief marble sculptures are known formally as the Elgin Marbles @ the British Museum's "Gallery"

-The work is attributed to the Ancient Greek sculptor Phidias (b. 447 BCE, d. 438 BCE) and span about 248 feet in display gallery length when mounted to a vertical wall.

Side Note I chose this bas relief depiction since every other South Metope example showed the Centaur raping a woman or attacking a man

Side Note 2 personally view depictions of rape/pillaging/stealing on fish in a barrel; something like disturbing & offensive
